Many think that buying a new watch is easy, but with so many options offered by brands, such as Seiko watches, making a choice can seem difficult. When considering a new watch you may want to think about when and where you are going to wear it and what you will be doing when it is on your wrist. You may also want to consider such aspects as time-keeping accuracy, water resistance, or whether you just want a nice, stylish watch to wear when you attend events.

Showing what time it is just one aspect of a watch. Watches can come in a variety of styles and with many added features, like alarms and calendars. Wristwatches which offer a stopwatch or multiple time displays are considered complicated watches. A less elaborate watch can just show the time or also the date.

When trying to decide which watch to purchase you may want to think about how you like the time to be displayed, in analogue or digital. Watches which are classic in style and formal are mostly analogue, and many consider this type of watch face less difficult to read. Many wristwatches used as fashion accessories tend to be analogue as they provide a greater opportunity for variation and styling.

For those more technologically minded, a digital display may be more in keeping with your tastes. In a digital watch the craftsmanship tends to focus more on the accuracy of the timepiece as well as any additional functions it may have, rather than aesthetic appeal. That is not to say that all digital watches look the same, aesthetics as well as the prestige of brand names can make digital watches just as appealing.

Classic dress watches are chosen for the craft and skill of the maker as well as the way they look. Generally they are analogue in style and the hand crafting of the mechanisms which drive the watch are a part of their value and prestige. As handcrafted formal watches are made with a particular mechanism, the uncoiling of a spring, they are apt to lose a few seconds each day, which makes them unsuitable for those interested in accurate time-keeping.

Formal dress watches, in the old tradition of Swiss watchmakers, are generally simply styled and of gold or some other precious metal. Dress watches for both men and women may have gems embedded into the dial or around the face of the watch. Handcrafted mechanisms for classic dress watches are more expensive and require regular maintenance or repair in order to keep their timing in tune.

The accuracy of quartz time-pieces has made them the choice for many athletes and sporting events. Quartz crystal is used as the mechanism to drive most watches, digital or analogue. Quartz fashion, novelty, or simple watches will have a long life of accuracy with few visits to the repair shop, no matter how much they cost.

Complications are features added to watches above the presentation of the time. Complicated watches are generally quartz and can have such extra features as water resistance as well as a stopwatch and various additional time and date functions including displaying the lunar phases. The durability of quartz mechanisms are part of the reason additional complications can be added to these kinds of multifunction watches.

Manufacturers are always exploring new power sources for their watches. Kinetic energy, or movement stored as energy is one of the power sources being constantly explored and improved. Recently, ecological sources of energy, such as the sun, are being refined to the benefit of wrist-watch wearers.
